

Evaluators from Air Force Space Command came to Malmstrom to test the wing's combat ability. They found out what Team Malmstrom has known all along ...

Montana warriors are Wing One

SSgt Janice Cannon

SSgt Janice Cannon

SSgt Janice Cannon

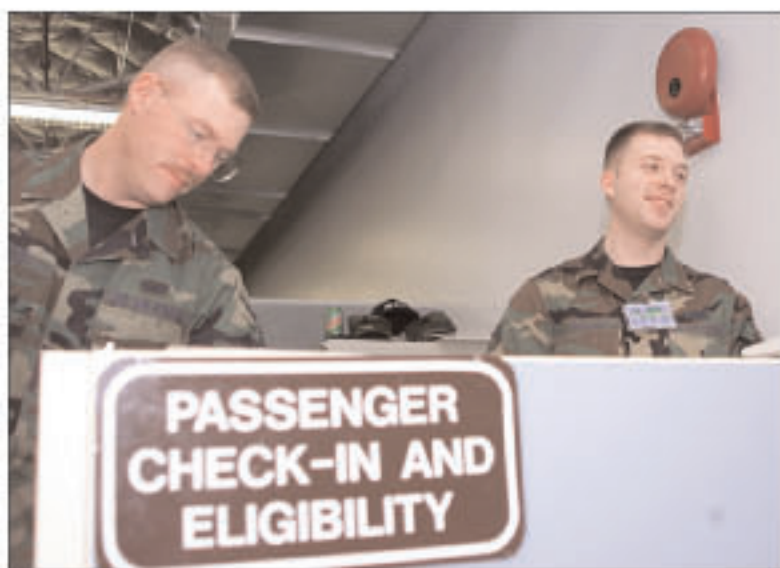

(Far left) When exercise demonstrators at Malmstrom's main gate trespassed on federal property, part of the security force response included a tactical response force. (Left) The 341st Medical Group's clinic continued to provide the health care necessary for the health and wellness of Team Malmstrom. (Below left) A1C David A. Fullam reviews technical orders during a re-entry system upload. (Below) Amn Joshua Finkbeiner and SrA Christopher Beavers, 741st Security Forces Squadron, hang camouflage netting to protect assets deployed to Camp Swampy.

SSgt Janice Cannon

SSgt Janice Cannon

SSgt Janice Cannon

(Top) 741st Security Forces Squadron members shut down a terrorist attack against a launch facility during the operational readiness inspection. (Above) SSgt Christopher Dempsey and SrA Michael McCall, 341st Mission Support Squadron, moved men and women through a mobility processing line before deploying to Camp Swampy. (Right) A1C Kelly Ginett, 341st Communications Squadron, works on network security that is critical to the success of the wing's mission. (Far right) A1C Chad Caddy was one of the people in the transportation squadron who kept the 341st Space Wing's fleet of vehicles rolling. The transporters, working with people from maintenance, logistics and augmentees, also processed cargo and passengers during the mobility exercise.

SrA Ed Braly

SSgt Jennifer Wallis

SSgt Janice Cannon

A1C David A. Fullam (left) and A1C Richard A. Marshallbot, 341st Maintenance Squadron, upload a re-entry system June 14 in the Weapons Storage Area under the watchful eyes of Air Force Space Command inspectors.